This week the market is about as clear as the air in Oregon. The tone has definitely settled from the pace we've seen in the last several months. Futures for November are speculating that the market could drop, but the fires that are burning throughout the west are keeping a tight lid on availability. Late shipments continue to be commonplace, and while there appears to be slight improvement on inventory build at the secondary level, it's still lean as could be out there. As the weather changes and the fires get contained, things will hopefully loosen - but this is 2020 and no doubt there's another curveball coming.
