It was another puny week for commodity markets as the combination of winter weather and economic headwinds blew the market to lower pricing. Demand continues to be weak for single-family, and mortgage interest rates are on the rise once again after enjoying some softness to start 2023. That ship appears now to have sailed into choppier waters. Texas saw better jobsite activity as a respite in the rain brought high temps. In California, green DF demand remained muted in comparison. Studs in both green and dry softened this week. OSB remains flat to down, while plywood is only slightly healthier in terms of market price. Still Jonesing for football? We are turning to hockey and college hoops. Pitchers and catchers will be reporting soon to baseball spring training - so there is hope!
