Sales were less than robust again this week, but that is not stopping mills and secondaries from raising prices. OSB in particular saw double-digit increase asks, with distributors being especially aggressive to the upside once again. Lean inventories are lending to the perception that demand is better than it actually is. Nonetheless, this is the market we will have to live in as we roll toward the holidays. As noted last week, the specter of holiday curtailments is looming just ahead, befitting for this Halloween season. Speaking of big things looming, the election will capture much attention next week. Likely the outcome will be up in the air well past Tuesday night. No matter what, the hope is to find a way to come together. Be sure to vote! Be good and be kind this week - and lets get back to business in hope of a clearer economic direction no matter who the president is. We've got homes and apartments to build!
