Lumber markets cooled from the pace of the last few weeks as inclement weather affected a large swath of the country, but the firmer tone that began in December remains in place nonetheless. We will see how strong that hold is in the coming week as demand remains muted. This bump in prices has been largely attributed to year-end capacity reductions at the mill level, but supply will likely catch back up in the near term. To no one's surprise, the Fed held interest rates flat this week, adding no spark to the market. Panels saw a slight uptick in OSB in primarily the southern regions, while plywood continues to flounder along. No football this week for the two-week break to the Superbowl gives us all a taste of what's to come after the big game. I might start actually doing chores again on Sundays - key word being might.
