Markets were a bit of a mixed bag this week, with firmness in panels and a topy, digestive tone in most lumber. Yella pine dimension saw the heaviest price concessions as supply began to climb in the face of still somewhat muted demand, especially in 4" and 6". Softness was prevalent across most other lumber species as well, while panels - especially SYP plywood - saw price gains. OSB was flat in most regions, but did see slight strength in some southern markets. Weather from the Midwest to the East appears to be showing marked improvement, and that could help takeaway to jobsites in the near term, but the dynamics that have been governing the housing market continue largely unchanged, and some days feel slower than Drake Maye's ability to read the Seattle defense last Sunday.
